About Food Ninja

Exploring the world one meal at a time.

Welcome to Food Ninja, a blog dedicated to food culture, travel, and the stories behind what we eat. I'm James Doe, a food writer and passionate traveler who believes that understanding a place means understanding its food.

My Story

I started Food Ninja in 2020 as a way to document my culinary adventures around the world. What began as a personal journal has grown into a community of food enthusiasts who share a curiosity about food, culture, and the connections between them.

From hidden izakayas in Tokyo to street food in Vietnam, from family recipes passed down through generations to the science behind why we crave certain flavors—there's always more to discover about food.

What Traveling Greece For 2 Weeks Taught Me About Life

JD James Doe Jun 21, 2021 11 min read

There's a particular kind of silence you find only in Greece — not the silence of emptiness, but the silence of accumulated time. Standing at the edge of a cliff in Zakynthos, watching the turquoise water carve itself against white limestone, I understood for the first time what it means to be small in a beautiful way.

I went to Greece thinking I was going on a food trip. I came back understanding something much harder to name.

your phone. By hour four you've accepted that you're simply a small object moving slowly across a large blue surface, and that this is fine.

Santorini's food is overpriced and the views are, frankly, absurd. Oia at sunset feels like someone turned the saturation up past what reality permits. But the best meal I had there wasn't at a clifftop restaurant — it was a paper plate of grilled octopus from a fisherman who had a cooler and a portable grill and absolutely no menu.

What I actually learned

Greece taught me that slowness is a skill. That a two-hour lunch is not laziness — it's a practice. That food tastes different when it arrives without urgency, when the person who made it sat down at the table next to you and is also eating.

I came home with olive oil, dried herbs, and a determination to stop eating lunch at my desk. I've managed one of those three things consistently.
